How do trees know when to wake up?

Our popular belief is that reduction of light hours triggers sleep and the return of light hours triggers awakening. However, scientists tell us that it is not day length but night length that is being monitored by the tree's chemistry through a phytochrome, a blue pigment that, when lit by a photon of red light, is activated to turn off.

Wake up! Wake up! It's warm outside.

It may be that after leaf drop there is a warm spell, but the tree doesn't heed this. Instead, it keeps on snoring above ground. This happens when the tree has been exposed to a cold spell for a certain period – dormancy has now been reached and it takes more than a warm spell to wake the tree up again.

The chilling hours.

In order to produce fruit, there is a period called the "chill hours" that many fruit-bearing trees (and some perennials and seeds) need to experience. This is a period that starts when the temperature reaches about 7 Celsius and ends just above the freezing mark at 3 Celsius. The number of hours between those two markers is what counts.
